

Gender differences in the rehabilitation of drug addicts

Abstract

We can see the use of drugs and the consequences of this addiction, as a human and social drama, that includes the drugs addicts, his family and his social and work relationship.

As we know, the social reinsertion stage is one part of the recuperation process of the drug addiction, so, the main objective of this work is try to elucidate to the importance of this stage, and make a connection with the genre question.

This study try as well, to demonstrate the necessity to considerate , along of the reinsertion process, that any person involved have all social rights and is involved in a determined social reality and is a part of various subsystems.

So, any reinsertion process is unique, because the addicts have many different necessities.

In scientific terms, the objective is to give an contribute to a better perception of the scourge of the drug addiction and is recuperation process.

Key words: Drug dependence, drugs, consumption, reintegration, gender, identity